RURAL

Route Statistics Show West Virginia Behind the Average Number.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 27.—West Virginia is far behind not only its neighboring states but the average of the United States in the proportion of rural routes to star routes in operation in the state. The star route service is a makeshift in the way of the delivery of mail. It is intended for the transportation of mail from one postoffice to another and only incidentally is mail deposited along the way for individuals. The rural delivery system provides for the delivery of mail to all persons along the route and is much more satisfactory to the people in the country who want prompt delivery of their mail. According to a statement made by P. V. McGraw, fourth assistant postmaster general, West Virginia had on April 1, 1912, 368 rural routes and 514 star routes, the latter far exceeding the former. At the same time there were in the United States 42,100 rural routes and 13,856 star routes. In the United States at large the number of rural routes was more than three times the number of star routes, while in West Virginia it was little more than half the number. In Pennsylvania there were 2,203 rural routes and 639 star routes. In Ohio there were 2,530 rural routes and 183 star routes. In Virginia there were 1,013 rural routes and 699 star routes.

FORTUNE SMILING ON "TECH" SCHOOLS

Name is Changed and More Money is Given by Andrew Carnegie.

PITTSBURGH, April 27.—The 2,598 students and the alumni and faculty of the big technical schools here are jubilant this week over several "red-letter" events that are just now making history for the institution which Andrew Carnegie has endowed with his name and his millions. Five smiles from Dame Fortune have happened to come together a change of name, a charter from the state of Pennsylvania, the power to grant degrees, the opening of Camp Louise Carnegie, and the beginning of two new buildings out of the founder's latest gift of $2,500,000.

It is stated on good authority that Mr. Carnegie has delayed acting on the matter of incorporation until he was certain that his group of technical schools had taken root and had proved themselves a success. Their remarkable growth in the seven years of their existence, in buildings, in student enrollment and in the work they are doing along the newer lines of education, has now won for them the official seal of recognition from both the state and the erstwhile "steel-master." By the terms of the new charter, the Carnegie Technical Schools will henceforth be known as the Carnegie Institute of Technology, and degrees will probably be conferred at the next commencement for the first time.

The departure this week of the first groups of students for Camp Louise Carnegie marks another innovation at "Tech." This 750 acre farm, presented sometime ago by Mr. Carnegie, and named after his wife, is beautifully situated on the Allegheny River about twenty-five miles from Pittsburgh. It has recently been converted into an engineering camp and experimental station, and students in certain courses will be located here at periods of the year to do all their practical field work. A large, old-fashioned mansion house on the property has been altered to provide instructional and living accommodations. The camp is also to be used for the art classes in architecture, for the training of architects, and for the camping parties of students and faculty members during the long summer vacation.

The laid, according to reliable figures, has already given his Pittsburgh institute about $22,000,000, over half of which is being spent in the cause of technical education. By providing a liberal endowment to take care of the operating cost of the college, the student fees are made nominal in amount, and the founder thus achieves his main purpose of putting an engineering, art or industrial education within reach of the ambitious boy of small means, and for the girl a preparation for efficiency in home-management, together with a training for some vocation in case future circumstances compel her to be a bread-winner.

The fifth event that has made the week notable was the laying of the corner stone Thursday, of a huge structure for the School of Applied Design, which is to be, it is said, the largest and finest building in this country for instruction in the arts. The event formed a part of the exercises which the Carnegie Institute holds annually, in observance of Founder's Day, the date this year being April 25. Viscount Chinda, the new Japanese ambassador to the United States, was honor guest and principal speaker. President Taft and President Lowell of Harvard, delivered the addresses on the two preceding occasions. A peasant in which over two hundred of the art students took part was presented in connection with the corner-stone laying.
